Teaching and scientific commitment:	Teaching and Scientific commitment will concern the academic discipline: BIO/07 – ECOLOGY The research activity is aimed at the conservation of marine ecosystems and biodiversity in the Mediterranean Sea. The project "Towards IMMA recognition" is thought at protecting the Canyon of

	Caprera, a very important hotspot located 15-30 miles off Capo Ferro (Sardinia). Underwater canyons are key structures for the functioning of the marine ecosystem and hotspots of marine biodiversity (eg. Boldrocchi et al., 2020a). The Canyon of Caprera, in particular, is characterized by a great density of pelagic fauna and represents an important foraging area (feeding) for 7 of the 8 species of cetaceans in the western Mediterranean (Bittau & Manconi, 2011). Cetaceans are well known as charismatic species and fundamental to ecosystems. In fact, many of these predatory species play a crucial role in maintaining the structure and function of marine ecosystems. Although widely recognized as key and priority species, multiple human activities (e.g. fishing, maritime traffic, chemical and pollution, tourist activities, direct and indirect effects of climate change, development and overbuilding of coasts) they put their survival at risk by involving important marine ecosystems of the Mediterranean. Biodiversity conservation and land management require data on the distribution of species at adequate resolution (e.g. Boldrocchi et al., 2017; 2020a,b; 2021). Therefore the research activities are aimed at understanding the spatial distribution and habitat preferences of marine mammal species at Caprera Canyon in order to promote it to IMMA and mitigate any impacts in the area, also analyzing any impacts that organisms may suffer through chemical analytical analysis of the different species present. The management of protected areas designed for umbrella species, such as cetaceans, is highly efficient and allows not only greater local biodiversity with benefits for the ecosystem, but also for local fishing activities related to them.
